

The term venison commonly refers to the meat of deer, but according to Purdue University, it can also mean the meat of other game animals, including elk, moose, caribou and antelope. These proteins have a gamey flavor because of the diet they eat; however, many of them - notably, deer meat - are lower in calories and fat than beef. Wild venison has a much lower fat content than any domesticated, reared animal. A reflection of the fact that the animal spent its life roaming the forests and feeding on local flora and fauna rather than being penned into a confined environment and spoon-fed on a diet of grain. With a low fat content and sinewy muscles from outdoor roaming it is important to marinate the meat before cooking, to add plenty of animal fats to impart flavour and texture and to cook the stew on a low heat. Precisely because wild game has not been industrialised it should be eaten sparingly and enjoyed with relish whenever one is fortunate enough to obtain some.
